About the Author

Jean Stewart was born and raised in the suburbs of Philadelphia. She grew up loving any and all sports, enthralled with nature and music. She spent years trying to achieve her childhood dream of reading every book in the Swarthmore library, and is now afflicted with a voracious appetite for books. Moving quickly, Whit scrambled back from the cliff face, sending a few loose rocks rolling toward the edge. She raced to her motorcycle, jumped into the saddle, and snapped the kickstand up with her boot. As she reached for the starter, a sudden blow across the back of her head sent the moon and stars into a swirling black sea. She felt herself tumble from the bike, roll onto her back. She lay there, insensible, paralyzed.

In the moon bright night, another motorcycle was visible at the edge of the forest, and a woman clad in black leather pants and jacket was suddenly standing at Whit's feet. Through slitted eyes, Whit watched the woman kneel down, grip her boots, and with a grunt, begin dragging Whit toward the cliff edge.
