Review

From Booklist:

Built more than 800 years ago, the Masterson bed has a wonderfully rich history, which museum curator Laurel Whitney loves relating to each group she shepherds through Masterson Manor. Today's tour is especially poignant because the owners of the manor have sold the place. Gathering her last group around her, Laurel tells them about the many Mastersons who have shared the bed: the medieval knight who returned home from the Crusades to find that his wife by proxy was not at all happy to see him, the Elizabethan mercenary who kidnapped the wrong woman only to realize he did not want to give her up, and the Regency miss who chains her former lover to the bed to keep her smuggler brother safe. Unbeknownst to Laurel, one more romance will be played out upon that famous bed--this one involving Laurel herself and annoyingly attractive handyman Ned Masterson. Dodd and Brockway's creative collaboration yields four delightfully humorous and delectably sexy romances that exemplify their witty writing and talent for creating compelling characters. *John Charles Copyright © American Library Association. From Publishers Weekly:

An 800-year-old bed bears silent witness to centuries' worth of naughty shenanigans in Once Upon a Pillow, a collaboration between veteran romance writers Christina Dodd and Connie Brockway. The epic opens in 13th-century England with a crusading knight and his fast-talking, murderous maiden bride and culminates with a present-day social history grad student who gives tours through the medieval manor house where the bed is the star attraction; she longs to acquire it or at least give it a whirl herself. Copyright 2002 Cahners Business Information, Inc.

From the Inside Flap

Not until her kidnapping did Lady Helwin realize how badly security in Trecombe had disintegrated.

When she heard the hoof beats galloping down the beach toward her, she turned -- and smiled.

Any woman who appreciated masculine beauty would have smiled. The beach stretched on in a smooth, unbroken line of silver sand and sheer cliffs, the wind blew off the sea, and Rion Masterson rode like a centaur, black cape and raven hair flying behind him, eyes glittering in the late afternoon sun, pleasure in the exhilarating ride emanating from every line of his fine form. A handsome figure of a man, an adventurer who had gone abroad to seek his fortune -- and failed miserably.

Now he sought prosperity closer to home, and Helwin wanted to wish him luck -- sarcastically, of course.

She'd observed the newly returned nobleman as he visited her uncle's house. She'd admired his grace, his wit, the skillful way he used his green eyes to tempt and seduce - not her, but her cousin Bertilda. She could have told him Bertilda might relish a dalliance with the dangerous lord of Castle Masterson, but Bertilda vetted her suitors' finances with the cool eye of a cutpurse.

But Helwin could tell Rion nothing. She was not permitted to show her face to visitors. Out of sight, out of mind, had been Uncle Carroll's philosophy about Helwin, and except for the occasional careless inquiry from one of her father's old friends, no one cared about Helwin's fate. Helwin might as well resign herself to living out her life as a lonely spinster in her uncle's household.

But she could still enjoy a solitary walk on the beach, and she did thrill to the sight of Rion Masterson riding toward her ... right toward her. Right at her.

She tried to move out of his path.

He swerved as if to follow her.

She waved her arms to call attention to herself.

He laughed, an open-mouthed, merry laugh that frightened her in its intensity.

Why was he riding at her so determinedly? Was he the kind of man who found pleasure in running down a helpless woman?

Or had someone -- Uncle Carroll, even Bertilda -- told him she would be here and offered him a reward for eliminating that annoying remembrance of former days?

Helwin caught her breath. Her heart skipped a beat, then leaped into a pounding frenzy. Bertilda. That witch Bertilda had insisted Helwin go for a late afternoon walk. She had insisted Helwin wear her purple velvet cape.

Bertilda had set her up.

Helwin fled, swerving to reach the boulders scattered at the bottom of the cliff. If she could make it that far, Rion wouldn't dare ride his precious war horse through the rubble and take a chance of laming him.

She could make it. Surely she could make it.

The stallion thundered behind her. She could almost feel its hot breath on her neck. But she was safe ... almost there ... when the horse charged past her. She had only a moment of optimism, a bleak hope that Rion would ride on when, with one strong arm below her ribs, he scooped her up.

She opened her mouth to scream, but in a single smooth movement, he brought her up and over, flinging her face-down before him on the horse.

"There you are, darling," he shouted. "You put on a good show, but I vow no one saw us. We'll be safe for the night."
